INTRODUCTION

INCOMING: Words of War is a fictional six-part web series created by Kerry Drumm.

Filmed over three days in December 2020 as the lockdown restrictions in Melbourne lifted in a set constructed in Kerry's lounge room.

Post production was completed April 2021, and the world premiere of episodes one and five will take place at SeriesFest 24 June – 11 July as part of the Digital Shorts Competition (Drama). INCOMING: Words of War has also been programmed and nominated in several festivals, winning Best Dramedy at Seoul Webfest, Best Director in a Drama at the Asia Web Awards, Best Ensemble and Best Actress for Samantha Hill at the British Web Awards.

All episodes were released via Vimeo Showcase on July 20, 2021.

INCOMING: Words of War focuses on seven Australian army soldiers of various ranks, played by Ruby Duncan, Cam Faull, Samantha Hill, Daniel O'Kane, Liam O'Kane, Katrina Mathers, Liam Seymour, and Cat Jardine as the voice of Q.

Written by Kerry Drumm, INCOMING: Words of War is Kerry's directing debut. Produced by Kerry Drumm, and Emma Hunt of Little Red Fox Productions.

Supported by December Media and Executive Producer Tony Wright.

Incoming – Katrina Mathers – Major Madeline Laughton – Episode 6: FAITHLESS

LOGLINE

Seven Australian soldiers take part in a social experiment to share their experience of being at war.

SHORT SYNOPSIS

Seven Australian soldiers take part in 'My Voice', a social experiment to document and share their experience of being at war. Visiting the 'My Voice' booth to answer pre-recorded questions by Q, the soldiers reveal personal stories, the impact of PTSD and reasons for joining the military.

LONG SYNOPSIS

The soldiers attend their first session in full uniform, dressed to impress. Initially unsure what to expect, some are confused when asked by Q's voice to meditate and describe their perfect sandwich. Each of the soldiers relives a memory relating to a sandwich, revealing a little about themselves.

Over the coming weeks, Q asks how the soldiers are sleeping, who their heroes are, what makes them happy, or if they have any superstitions. Captain Laura Mantle shares her fear of tempting fate, risking losing the love of her life. Corporal Ben Lawley finally opens up about his broken heart from losing a parent as a child. Corporal Rosie Nolan expresses her anxiety at her military family's expectations to be a model soldier, while Major Madeline Laughton gives a hint of alcohol dependency to function fully.

Sergeant Walker talks direct to Q and demands more help for soldiers grappling with PTSD, unknowing he's suffering from the condition himself. Captain Malone, a military padre, examines his faith as the guidance he once depended on is starting to fade.

Christmas day arrives, and the soldiers, receiving a gift from Q, admit to resolving issues that surfaced during their sessions.

Captain Timothy Malone decides to walk away from his faith and the army; Major Madeline Laughton has vodka, and Sergeant Jake Walker rescues a dog. Sergeant Grant, flying home early to meet his son, fears his role as a new dad, Corporal Ben Lawley, a little smitten after accidentally bumping into Corporal Rosie Nolan in the booth, leaves her Christmas present for her.

The season concludes with a cliff hanger as the base comes under attack as Rosie opens Ben's present, and contact is lost with the My Voice booth.

DIRECTORS STATEMENT

The idea behind INCOMING: Words of War started to form after I watched Peter Jackson's First World War documentary, They Shall Not Grow Old. I remember fighting tears at the footage of soldiers in the trenches playing cards, reading, writing letters home or trying to sleep. At the same time, above them, the sounds of war, fighting and explosions continue. I was reminded of my time as a military wife and receiving letters from my husband away on deployment.

As a potential series, I knew I wanted to explore the idea that very little has changed for soldiers, in that they still read, sleep, call home to the sounds of war above them. I was keen to explore why someone joins the military. PTSD is often associated with the military and remains a serious concern for many, and I wanted to explore that. I also wanted to showcase soldiers' high spirits by offering funny moments of mischief and playfulness.

Writing the series took about six weeks, and I wrote the characters with specific actors in mind. They were familiar with my work and came from film and theatre backgrounds, which gave me the confidence to develop more extended monologues. It also allowed me to approach them without a script and ask if they'd be interested. Lucky for me, they all said yes.

The challenge was working around the lockdown restrictions and the limit of numbers allowed in a single setting. With this in mind, I came up with the idea of setting INCOMING inside a small booth. This enabled us to restrict interactions between the actors - we do have one scene where two of our actor's cross paths at a distance, but that was it. For the most part, it's them in a booth answering the questions voiced by Q.

Once lockdown restrictions eased, we saw a window of opportunity, and we built the booth and filmed over two weekends. We kept the booth's design a secret, and the actors saw it for the first time when they stepped on set, which happened to be in my dining room! Working with cinematographer David Richardson, we agreed on a fixed lens, allowing our actors to come in and out of focus, which works well with the setting.

Many of the stories in INCOMING come from my personal experiences of being a part of that world, and it was important to me that it felt authentic. My hope is that we've offered an insight into the life of a soldier and the world of the military.

Kerry Drumm, April 2021

Incoming: Words of War

Seven Australian soldiers take part in a social experiment to share their experience of being at war.

Interview with Writer/Director Kerry Drumm and Producer Emma Hunt

Congratulations! Why did you make your film?

KERRY: The idea behind INCOMING: Words of War started to form after I watched Peter Jackson's First World War documentary, They Shall Not Grow Old. I remember fighting tears at the footage of soldiers in the trenches playing cards, reading, writing letters home or trying to sleep. At the same time, above them, the sounds of war, fighting and explosions continue. I was reminded of my time as a military wife and receiving letters from my husband away on deployment.

EMMA: After creating Little Red Fox Productions in 2020, I wanted my debut production to be something that resonated with me. I knew Kerry would be writing from experience and as with Kerry's writing, the script would be bold and confronting but laced with humour. I also have a direct family connection to the military, and I feel these stories need to be told.
